Poems like Kaur's fall under the broad umbrella of what can be called "mango diaspora poetry," an often-ridiculed subgenre (here, here, and here), which characterizes so much of the writing by and about South Asians in the West. These poems rely on stereotypes that often flatten the description of the complex South Asian experience into universal nostalgic sadness entwined with imagery of ...

The convergence of self-isolating with the hurt and frustration in response to racism in our country threatens our individual mental health in unique ways. In the confines of our homes we're forced to get still, and for many of us that means we're now in company with waves of self-reflection that can either serve or master our isolation.
