ing an essentially semiological distinction. Mitry did indeed campaign on every front of our field, besting Sadoul's history with his sophisticated stylistic cate-gories, arguing with Metz on the basis of historical example. His feistiness won him few friends. Mitry was bull-headed and without the kind of elegance that often excuses French tenacity.

He proposed instead (i.e. in place of a long take aesthetic) a "synthesis theory" which accounts for all means of expression." 9 Mitry's long take formulation is an "anti-theory" which has not been popularized as much as Bazin's cinematic realism; but even so, Mitry's concept of synthesis (long take + montage) brings battle to Bazin's "ontological theory," calling into question the meaning of cinematic reality. Mitry's cinema becomes a matter of free will, conscious ...
