The statement makes me reel, considering all the lies I've told her lately. My right hand is trembling, but I manage to get the key in the lock and open the door. Mom blocks me from getting in. "I have to go!" I shout at her. My voice lowers a notch. "I have to." She gazes into my eyes. "You can't drive.

What if I told you that a quarter of everything your girlfriend said to you was a straight up lie? You'd probably call my bluff—and you'd be right. But not because I'm exaggerating. That number is actually worse—at least according to Texas A&M University research. In their study, researchers found that dating couples lie to...
