The New York City Department of City Planning (DCP) stands with the Black Community within our agency and across New York City. We recognize that planning policies and zoning codes have acted for decades as bulwarks against fairness, inclusion and integration, and that they have played a large role in perpetuating racism and even violence against Black and Brown Americans.

New York is a city that set the status quo for city planning since 1916 with the nation's first comprehensive zoning solution. That also means that New York City is an old city, with old buildings and old infrastructure. Our city planners have to tackle some big issues and try to pull New York out of the twentieth century and modernize the city.
