They see teaching as a tool for helping students get certified, not as a tool for improving the world. Giroux argues that the role of teachers and administrators is to become "transformative intellectuals who develop counterhegemonic pedagogies that not only empower students by giving them the knowledge and social skills they will need to be able to function in the larger society as critical agents, but also educate them for transformative action.

Why teachers quit matters; but a more important question is: What would it take for schools and districts to get teachers to not only stay, but to thrive? If we want to empower teachers, we need to move away from a punitive, one-size-fits-all model of management and evaluation and toward a model of collaboration and personalized support.
